"Great respect was given and prayer was offered when medicines and foods were harvested. To take too much could lead to the depletion of a source; so much care was taken to ensure that these plants would be available for future use. Today, the struggle for a respectful coexistence continues. It is everyone's responsibility to ensure that the gifts we enjoy in our everyday lives are not taken in excess. To lessen our impact on the land is to show respect for our home. This program speaks to that."

Morongo Green Enterprise Program

For thousands of years, the Native American people of Southern California drew on their understanding of the natural world to thrive. Yet, the people understood they were connected to an interacting, natural system and they had an obligation to the rest of the universe's creatures. This rich knowledge of how nature works and how to use resources without depleting them was a result of intense observation, patience, and a sense of kinship with the natural environment.
