Federally Delegated Environmental Regulation

Congress has acted under several federal environmental statutes to authorize the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to delegate to Indian tribes specific enforcement and regulatory authority to the same or similar degree EPA previously was authorized to delegate to states. The EPA has implemented an “Indian policy” designed to implement federal policies of tribal self-determination in its environmental regulation on Indian lands. The policy has two major elements: first, EPA or tribes, rather than states, should implement federal environmental statutes on Indian lands; second, where it is authorized, EPA will cooperate with and assist tribes in developing and implementing tribal programs under federal environmental statutes.

Authorized by Morongo Tribal Council, the Environmental Department is seeking such delegation to administer sections of the Clean Water Act, the Clean Air Act and the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act that will have the backing of federal law.
